The two edicts of the 14th September, 1811, may be considered as the culminating point of the legislation which goes by the name of Stein and Hardenberg. Nothing could exceed the malicious joy of the aristocratic French party when Steins dismissal, on the 24th November, appeared in the Gazette. Count York, whose characteristic letter we have already quoted, again committed his views to paper in a communication to Lieut. -Colonel von Oppen, and melancholy it is indeed that such a disgraceful record of narrow-mindedness and ignorance should have come down to us on the part of one who was otherwise a good man and an excellent officer. Our foreign relations begin to take a more favourable aspect; and our home affairs a more rational turn. One silly head has been already crushed; the other vile brood will stifle in their own venom. I hope things...
