J This passage has been learnedly discussed by Mons. Dacier, as quoted by his Lady. The Critic thinks it resers to a whimsical custom arisng from the superstition of the ancients, who, it seems, in order to form an adequate judgment of their future success in love, took a poppy, and tried whether by striking their hand, or elbow against it, any noise ensued; if there did, they depended upon a happy issue, if not, they of consequence were reduced to despair. The misfortune is, that although this...
